

Tommy was first before. Be first again.

America's Next Sport. Tommy's Next Move.

Flag football debuts at the 2028 Olympics in Los Angeles. Tommy Hilfiger recently signed Travis Kelce as Global Brand Ambassador, with the first campaign already shot at the Plaza in early April. Snoop Dogg has run a football league in Los Angeles for twenty years. Every asset is already in place. This is the moment — and it belongs to Tommy Hilfiger.

THE SPORT

Flag football is not a trend.
It is a transformation.

THE MOMENT —

America's fastest-growing sport is two years from its peak.

Flag football is the fastest-growing sport in America across every dimension that matters to brands — youth participation, female inclusion, professional investment, and cultural crossover. In 2028, it debuts on the Olympic stage in Los Angeles. The build-up is already underway.

On March 21, 2026, the Fanatics Flag Football Classic was held at BMO Stadium in Los Angeles — the same venue that will host the 2028 Olympic flag football competition. Tom Brady, Jalen Hurts, Joe Burrow, Jayden Daniels and Team USA competed in front of a live audience and the world. The NFL formally announced its professional flag league on March 30, backed by $32 million from NFL clubs and investors including Peyton Manning, Joe Montana, Steve Young, Tom Brady, Serena Williams, and Russell Wilson. The sport's institutional infrastructure is now complete — from youth to high school to college to Olympics to professional. It has arrived.

WHY FASHION HAS NOT CLAIMED THIS —

The official lanes are all occupied.

Every official sponsorship category in flag football's Olympic moment already has a name on it. What remains is the most valuable category of all — the cultural lane. That lane has no name on it yet.

Under Armour holds the exclusive uniform, apparel, and footwear contract with USA Football through the 2028 Olympics — they dress the athletes on the field. Ralph Lauren has dressed Team USA at opening and closing ceremonies for nearly 20 years, with their deal running through 2028 — they own the formal Olympic moment. What neither brand owns is the culture around the sport: the athlete off the field, the lifestyle moment, the replica jersey, the LA community connection, the celebrity activation, the fashion narrative. That is where Tommy Hilfiger lives. And that territory is completely unclaimed.

The momentum behind flag football has been building for decades. The pathway is there. Once the Olympics hit, everyone is going to want to play flag football — the brands present from the beginning own the narrative. The brands that arrive in 2027 are just sponsors.

— MIKE MCCARLEY, CEO TMRW SPORTS / NFL FLAG FOOTBALL LEAGUE, MARCH 2026

02

THE ASSETS

Tommy already holds every card that matters.

WHAT MAKES THIS TOMMY'S MOMENT —

Three assets. No other brand can put them together.

The flag football cultural moment requires three things simultaneously: a credible connection to the sport's LA roots, a bridge to the NFL mainstream, and American heritage brand DNA. Tommy Hilfiger has all three — and they are all active right now.

I

TRAVIS KELCE — GLOBAL BRAND AMBASSADOR, SIGNED MARCH 2026.

Tommy Hilfiger recently announced Travis Kelce as Global Brand Ambassador and Creative Collaborator — a multi-season partnership beginning Fall 2026 that includes co-designed collections and campaigns, with the first campaign imagery already captured at the early April Plaza shoot. Tommy himself called Kelce “a true American icon” and “in the zeitgeist.” Kelce is simultaneously the NFL's most culturally crossover-active player, a three-time Super Bowl champion, and the defining face of the generation bridging sport and style. He is also Tommy's description made flesh: “Flag Made Current.” His game-day arrivals are photographed like red-carpet moments. He was described in the official PVH release as “a tunnel-walk pioneer.” The flag football moment — which is fundamentally about sport culture crossing into mainstream entertainment — is exactly what Kelce represents. This asset is already paid for. It simply needs to be pointed at this moment.

II

SNOOP DOGG — THE ORIGINAL TH BRIDGE, 20 YEARS OF LA FOOTBALL.

In 1994, Snoop Dogg wore a Tommy Hilfiger rugby shirt on Saturday Night Live — gifted to him hours before the show. Sales skyrocketed overnight. The brand's defining hip-hop era began. That was not a campaign. It was chemistry between two forces at exactly the right cultural moment. That chemistry still exists. And Snoop is now the single person on earth who connects flag football, Los Angeles, and Tommy Hilfiger simultaneously. Since 2005, he has run the Snoop Youth Football League — which has served over 60,000 kids in Los Angeles and produced more than 50 NFL players including CJ Stroud and JuJu Smith-Schuster. He co-founded the Snoop & Housh Flag Football League with the LA Chargers in 2024. He was the cultural centerpiece of the 2024 Paris Olympics. He is the only person alive who is simultaneously a Tommy Hilfiger cultural institution, the founder of LA's most significant youth football program, and the face of Olympic flag football's American moment. No other brand has access to this person in this way.

III

AMERICAN HERITAGE BRAND DNA — THE IDENTITY ALIGNMENT

Flag football's Team USA palette is red, white, and blue. Tommy Hilfiger's brand DNA is red, white, and blue. The sport is young, inclusive, and growing fastest among women and girls — precisely the North American consumer Tommy needs to re-engage. The Olympic moment is in Los Angeles — where Tommy's cultural history in hip-hop, celebrity, and street-to-runway crossover is most deeply rooted. This is not a forced association. It is structural alignment. Ralph Lauren owns the formal Olympic ceremony version of American identity. Tommy owns the version that actually lives in the communities where this sport is exploding — and has for thirty years.

THE PLAY

On the jersey. Off the field.
Everywhere it counts.

THE STRATEGY —

Two tracks. One outcome. Total cultural ownership.

The play operates simultaneously on two tracks. The first is a co-promotion approach to Under Armour — positioned correctly, this benefits both brands significantly. The second requires no permission from anyone and generates the cultural moment regardless of what UA decides.

TRACK ONE — THE JERSEY —

Approach UA about co-promotion on the uniform and training collection

Under Armour holds the exclusive USA Football contract and is in its third consecutive year of revenue decline — North America revenue fell 10% in Q3 FY2026. Their CEO has publicly stated the need to “reignite brand relevance.” They have the jersey and none of the cultural heat to make it matter. Tommy has Snoop, Kelce, the heritage, and the activation infrastructure UA cannot buy. The co-promote framing is simple: UA gets the cultural chapter their turnaround desperately needs. Tommy gets his name on a flag football training and lifestyle collection — the most direct counter-narrative to the outlet perception problem available in the North American market. This conversation is Tommy offering UA its most valuable opportunity, not Tommy asking for access.

TRACK TWO — THE ATHLETE —

Dress Team USA everywhere UA's contract does not reach

UA's contract governs competition and official training apparel. It does not govern what an athlete wears arriving at the venue, walking through the Olympic Village, appearing at press, or posting on their own social channels. Tommy's team builds direct relationships with Team USA flag football athletes and provides product for every unofficial moment — arrivals, press, events, content. No permission required from UA. No USOPC contract required for organic cultural viability. The tunnel photograph, the village content, the press appearance — these are the images that define the cultural memory of an Olympic Games. Kelce, as brand ambassador, anchors the narrative. Snoop activates the LA community. The athletes provide the imagery. This track works regardless of UA's decision.

THE COMMERCIAL CASE —

Everyone in Los Angeles in a flag jersey.

The jersey the athlete wears becomes the jersey everyone wants. This is how sports merchandising has always worked — and the flag football replica market is completely unclaimed by any fashion brand.

A Tommy Hilfiger designed flag football jersey — elevated enough to wear outside a game context, American enough to read as cultural artifact, accessible enough to reach every demographic — is not purely a sports product. It is a cultural identity purchase for anyone who wants to say they were part of this moment in Los Angeles in 2028. The Olympic host city retail window is finite, captive, and enormous. Tourists. Locals. Content creators. The 60,000 families who came through Snoop's league over twenty years. All of them are potential customers. The price architecture writes itself: a premium limited version builds the brand ceiling, an accessible version puts product in every neighborhood Snoop's infrastructure has touched.

This is also the argument for PVH's finance team. The Kelce partnership is already funded. The Snoop relationship is already in place. The incremental investment required to activate around flag football is modest relative to what these existing assets cost — and the flag football activation gives both investments a compounding return they would not otherwise generate. This is not a new budget line. It is the most efficient use of existing assets available in the North American market today.

THE OUTCOME

What each party gets.
Why it is balanced.

THE EXCHANGE —

Tommy has the culture. UA has the contract. Both need the other.

TOMMY HILFIGER GETS

— Athletic credibility in an Olympic sport — the most direct structural counter to outlet perception in North America

— Design influence over how flag football's Team USA presents itself — on and around the field

— Compounding return on the Kelce and Snoop investments already made — each amplifies the other

— Replica merchandise revenue from the largest captive retail window in US sport in 2028

— First-mover position for professional team partnerships as the NFL league scales post-Olympics

— A cultural north star that elevates everything in the mainline beneath it — globally and in North America specifically

UNDER ARMOUR GETS

— The cultural activation their turnaround has been unable to generate internally — the missing chapter

— Snoop Dogg — who is not organically reaching a UA jersey without Tommy's cultural infrastructure around it

— Travis Kelce as the NFL bridge — connecting their official contract to the sport's most visible cultural moment

— Fashion credibility on the lifestyle and training collection adjacent to their competition apparel

— A story that differentiates UA from Nike in the flag football space — where Nike has only grassroots presence

— Their most significant brand relevance moment since the Curry Brand — at a time when the CEO is publicly calling for exactly this

THE SPORT GETS

— Fashion legitimacy at its Olympic debut — the signal that flag football has arrived as a cultural force, not just an athletic one

— A replica market that makes team identity accessible to every fan in every price tier across Los Angeles

— The Snoop-Kelce cultural axis as its ambassadors — connecting twenty years of LA youth football to the Olympic stage

— A template for how fashion and sport intersect in the professional league — setting a standard before conversions happen

Move One

NOW — Q3 2026

APPROACH UA. ACTIVATE SNOOP. BUILD ATHLETE RELATIONSHIPS.

Tommy initiates the conversation with Under Armour — framed not as a request for access but as an offer: Tommy brings the cultural activation UA's contract cannot generate alone. Simultaneously, and regardless of UA's decision, activate Snoop's SVFL and Snoop & Housh Flag Football League as the grassroots layer. The 60,000 families who have come through Snoop's league are a direct community distribution channel no marketing budget can replicate. Begin building personal relationships with Team USA flag football athletes for off-field dressing. The Kelce campaign launching Fall 2026 can be oriented to signal the flag football connection from the beginning. Move before competitors recognize what is being built.

Move Two

2027 — PRE-OLYMPIC

LAUNCH THE CAPSULE. DRESS THE ATHLETES. BUILD THE RED CARPET.

Release a flag football-inspired limited collection in select markets: New York, Los Angeles, London, Amsterdam, Not mass. Not promotional. Intentional distribution that creates demand rather than satisfying it. Team USA athletes in Tommy at the IFAF World Championships in Germany — August 2026. A Snoop activation connecting his league's legacy to the Olympic moment arriving in his city. Kelce-fronted content bridging the NFL, Tommy, and flag football into one coherent cultural narrative. Build the red carpet strategy: specific pieces in the hands of people with genuine taste credibility who generate the “what is that” moment rather than the “I've seen that everywhere” moment. Arrive at LA28 with 18 months of cultural presence, not a launch campaign.

Move Three

SUMMER 2028

OWN LOS ANGELES. OWN THE TUNNEL. OWN THE REPLICA MARKET.

Team USA athletes arrive at LA28 in Tommy. The tunnel photographs are Tommy. The village content is Tommy. Snoop is in Tommy. Kelce anchors the cultural narrative. The replica jersey — is in every neighborhood Snoop's league has served for twenty years. The Olympic host city retail window is finite and enormous. BMO Stadium — where the Fanatics Classic was held in March 2026 — is the same venue as the Olympic competition. Tommy's presence in that geography is already being established. The question is whether it is intentional or accidental.

Move Four

2029 & BEYOND

PROFESSIONAL LEAGUE. SUPER TEAMS. CREATIVE AUTHORITY.

The NFL's professional flag football league launches post-Olympics, operated by TMRW Sports with $32 million in NFL club investment and equity partners including Peyton Manning, Joe Montana, Steve Young, Tom Brady, and Serena Williams. Teams will need identities, uniforms, and lifestyle collections. Tommy Hilfiger, having defined what flag football looks like at its Olympic debut, walks into those conversations as the incumbent creative authority rather than an applicant. Back specific super teams. Build uniform identities. Own the aesthetic of the sport as it professionalizes globally. This is not a sponsorship that ends. It is creative ownership of a sport's visual identity from its beginning — the most durable brand position available.

THE COMMERCIAL FLYWHEEL

Each move funds and validates the next.

This is not a time-bounded sponsorship. It is a compounding business architecture — every activation building the foundation for the next, driven by assets Tommy already owns, generating revenue at each stage while building the brand position that makes the next stage possible.

01

UA CO-PROMOTE — JERSEY & TRAINING COLLECTION

Tommy's design on the official product ecosystem. The athletic credential established. The conversation begun.

02

ATHLETE DRESSING — LA28 CULTURAL MOMENTS

Kelce and Snoop anchor the narrative. Team USA athletes in Tommy off the field. The images define the cultural memory.

03

REPLICA MARKET — LOS ANGELES 2028

Every tourist, every local, every Snoop league family. The host city retail window: finite, captive, enormous.

04

PROFESSIONAL LEAGUE — TEAM PARTNERSHIPS

Post-Olympics, team identities needed. Tommy walks in as the established creative authority, not an applicant.

05

SUPER TEAMS — LONG-TERM IP

Back specific teams. Own uniform identities. Define the aesthetic of the sport as it scales globally.
